Egyptian “Sun Boat”

Wooden Replica of Khufu’s Sun Boat with Display Case

The Solar boats of ancient Egyptians consist of large ships that were made out of cedar wood and they were used in religious rituals during the Pharaohs’ time. Historians and archeologists have had long debates about the name and the purpose of these boats. However, probably these boats were manufactured to be used in the funerary rituals of the King and maybe some of his royal family members.

A compartment that stands upon three circular columns is located at the stern of the solar boat. This compartment has a double ceiling based upon some pillars that were made in the shape of the papyrus plants. The function of this compartment was to protect the captain of the boat against the sun rays.

The boat has twelve paddles; five of them were used for rowing from each side with four of these five paddles made in the shape of a bayonet that were used by the unseen sailors to protect the boat in its journey to the other world according to the ancient Egyptian mythology. This is besides the two paddles that were used to correct the path of the boat the same way the rudder functions.
